Today, for the first time, I attended a lacrosse match — a sport whose rules remain largely unknown to the general public, myself included.

Margaret had won two tickets in an internal work competition: she came second, and the prize was, indeed, two tickets to the match between the Squeelers and the Trackfinders. First prize was an air fryer, and third was a voucher for an Aperol spritz. I'm still unsure what logic governed the distribution of awards, but no matter.

We arrived at the stadium roughly an hour before kick-off and got in without spending even half a second in a queue. We thought there would be far more people, but apparently not. We walked past the DVD rental stand and the in-house library, and once in the stands, we observed the venue slowly — though never entirely — filling up. The teams eventually entered the pitch two minutes before kick-off. The Lacrosse League anthem played over the speakers, and then the match began.

Lacrosse is a rather peculiar sport. It's played eight-a-side on a pitch twice the size of a rugby field. The aim is to reach the goal with a ball similar to a baseball, thrown using long, narrow rackets. The issue is that the goal is only twice the size of the ball, and to score, one must shoot from a minimum distance of 40 metres.

As a result, the overwhelming majority of matches end 0–0, not helped by the fact that one player, the Blockkeeper, has the sole job of lying down in front of the small goal, thereby obstructing it entirely. Over the course of the full three hours of the match, we witnessed zero shots on target and zero attempts.

The main problem is that both a draw and a loss earn zero points, while a win earns a single point. Looking at the statistics, I was surprised to find that the last time a goal was scored in a match was six years ago — and that, thanks to entire seasons ending with zero points, promotions or relegations are virtually impossibile.

Nevertheless, the experience has its appeal, because the federation actively encourages spectators to use those hours to read a book, watch a film, or engage in whatever other activity they please. I, for example, played Persona 4 Golden on the Switch and completed the first dungeon. It was certainly a positive experience.
